You need to check if the execution was successful and not the against the bind_param() method. Then the third (conditional statement) won't theoretically thrown an error because of what you have in your query that would theoretically be considered as being a valid (query) statement. What you need to do is to remove the if(!$statement) statement from the bind, but keep it in the execution part. You will then receive an error. Your first conditional statement for if($statement = $con->prepare($sqlQuery)) is valid, so the else for it won't throw an error since it hasn't been executed. Consult the following reference manuals on PHP.net on how to query/che
